

CROWDED PLACES RISK ASSESSMENTS

Recent crowded places attacks highlight the need to reduce the risk of intentionally hostile acts while improving preparedness and strengthening ongoing efforts in order to prevent future occurrences.

Crowded Places Risk Assessments

The threat of crowded places attack in Australia is significant and persistent. As we have seen in the United States, United Kingdom and across Europe, such attacks by terrorists and serious criminals can happen at any time and any place - without warning.

The frequency of actual and disrupted crowded places incidents has increased dramatically in recent years; from the use of improved explosives devices, a vehicle with hostile intent or an active armed offender carrying a firearm or knife, these attacks have affected numerous places where people and businesses congregate, including: tourist attractions, workplaces, campuses, shopping malls and centres, transport hubs, public meetings, and market places.

From a security perspective, crowded places are very challenging environments, with any area where people gather potentially becoming a target for hostile and malicious attacks – whether carefully planned or opportunistic.

Understanding the threats we face within places of mass gathering and ways to mitigate them is vital. To effectively achieve this, it is important to understand the threat and associated risks through an event or site-specific risk assessment. You can then begin to introduce recommended risk mitigation measures to reduce identified vulnerabilities.

MPS takes a holistic and tailored approach to the facilitation of crowded places risk assessments and risk mitigation, encompassing recognised state and government guidelines and best-practice security standards – protecting against current and evolving terrorist and serious criminal based threat acts.
